

WORK POETRY/

POÉSIE DE TRAVAIL

You Are What You Eat
(what the restaurant had for dinner) a janitor from Fiji who came in every morning at 5:00 for two years and was never given a holiday a preparation cook who spent his days riding a carousel of raw beef and his nights in the bar trying to regain his balance a hostess who really enjoyed her work but only got one shift a week after she stopped sleeping with the manager a bartender who did exactly what he was told and made the driest martinis in town, using no vermouth whatever a waitress hired for her nice tits and good teeth an eighteen-year-old broiler cook who ransomed himself to General Motors for eight cylinders and a set of mag wheels a seventeen-year-old broiler assistant who spent all his money on marijuana the captain of the college football team, hired as a waiter because the boss had a soft spot for anyone who looked at home in a locker room the broiler assistant's kid brother

212 LABOUR/LE TRAVAIL

a dishwasher whose name nobody knew and whose disappearance wasn't noticed until halfway through the first turn.

each entree was served with salad and a seasonal vegetable.

the bill came to three dollars an hour and a percentage of the tips.

Slapstick

even from inside the mill the lumber carrier always sounded like a sky full of geese dive bombing the yard; but one time it came through like a bloated elephant unable to fart because some guy had a hangover and filled the horn with toilet paper and a kid on the dayshift had his guts spread like gossip all over the sawdust.

then the guy who tailed number three sticker came over to see what happened and went ass over tea kettle when he stepped on a kidney.

the foreman said it was the funniest thing he ever saw.

It's All Our Fault

it's all our fault -
we killed the redwoods and now we're ready to take the blame and pay the money that we get paid to see them protected in national parks that we don't own.

we're the people who fished out the oceans so our kids could eat oatmeal and day old bread and now we're waiting out the moratorium on the catching of roe herring, waiting also for the first unemployment cheque and the kids are eating oatmeal without sugar, but we're not complaining - it's all our fault.

we're the people who followed the boom and brought the oil out of the ground to fuel the cars that others of us made so they could eat, and we're the people who built the roads we use to get to places where we build more cars, more roads and better mouse traps and now that we have to wear gas masks and listen to smog alerts, we're sorry - it's all our fault.

we're the people who are ruining the economy with our outrageous wage demands: father, forgive us, for we understand not the ways of inflation.

we're the people who destroyed the institution of marriage and the sanctity of the nuclear family by not resisting the sexual advances of our bosses - it's all our fault; we should have had more personal integrity.

we killed the whales, the seals, the buffalo and each other, we poisoned the air, polluted the water and made this a planet fit only for insects.

we did it for wages;
 it's all our fault -

we did it because we didn't know there was anyone else to go to work for.

Show Business

At five o'clock they drift in from mill, ranch and road crew, all hard hats and greasy hands, to order twenty beer and slap their quarters on the pool table.

Dusk has fallen on the far side of Marlboro Country and the entertainer, armed only with his guitar, two draft and a package of Meggezones, is about to commence his nightly ritual before these emperors of the north.

Before the night is over he will have sung seventy-five songs, drunk twenty beers,
made three friends,
had at least three drunks ask to borrow his guitar, been told that he sounds just like everybody from Jimmie Rodgers to Neil Sedaka
and had an indecent proposition from the ugliest woman in the bar.

His struggle, unlike that of the gladiator and the old-time trail rider is not the stuff of which movies are made.

He will never be played by Victor Mature or Randolph Scott; his fate is held not on the hands of Caesar Augustus or even Ben Cartwright, but in those of a half-pissed heavy equipment operator from the department of highways who hates country music.

Before the week is over he will have sung four hundred and fifty songs, drunk one hundred and twenty beers, made nine friends, had at least twenty-four drunks (allowing for an increase on Saturday night) ask to borrow his guitar, been told that he sounds just like everybody from Hank Williams to Enrico Caruso and the ugliest woman in the bar will have given up men and moved in with a grizzly bear from Fort St. John.

His survival, unlike that of
 will earn him neither an appointment in the praetorian guard nor a dirty weekend in Dodge City.

Before he reaps his reward he will have paid sixty-two dollars and fifty cents to his agent, spent fifty-eight dollars on food and drink, paid one hundred dollars to the Greyhound bus company for transporting himself and his equipment twelve hundred miles, forfeited thirty dollars by losing his voice during El Paso and not finishing his last two sets, owed most of the rest to the income tax authorities and frozen his butt waiting for a bus that didn't arrive till two in the morning.

His replacement, arriving on Monday, will have nothing in common with gladiators and old-time trail riders.
 Toga and Stetson will be packed off to mothballs and cedar chests and judgement will be easier at the hands of a half-pissed
 who likes strippers.

sticker crew

assured that a constant diet of hemlock, fir and cedar, seasoned with occasional fingers, will keep the metal reptiles as quiet as stuffed anacondas trios of men force mouthfuls of tree remnants through the steel bowels their security guaranteed by iron snores, their lives haunted

by the long spectre of the mating season.

Coon Hunting on the Afternoon Shift every Monday at four he stuffs his interrogative barrels with ritual birdshot a Greek version of Davy Crockett, camouflaged in five o'clock shadow, stalking sexuality through the processed forest.

“how you make out on weekend, young fella?
get piece tail?”

my tongue twists to answer but flops like a flaccid balloon unlettered in this language of trophies:

his wife's genitals dripping from the back of his baseball cap.

Lunchroom at the Millwork Plant four walls and a few rows of collapsible tables and tubular chairs

a hammock, hung

between the whistles that call us back to the making of money and doors.

Michelle

Michelle and her sister, picking over the fish and chips in a Hastings Street oyster bar, half drunk at four in the afternoon, writing postcards to Pender Harbour. been in town two days and haven't drawn a sober breath - last night the Brandiz, tonight the Travellers; maybe tomorrow they'll look for work.
Michelle says if she can find a logger who can drink her under the table she'll marry him;
her sister wonders where they'll have the honeymoon.
